

My research focusses on consumption/savings behavior particularly how behavioral tendencies at microeconomic household level impact broader, macroeconomic trends. Currently, my research is bifurcated, focussing on how individual savings rates can be improved by financial services innovations, and how today's consumption/savings behavior may have future generational welfare implications as society skews older.